The present study explores the effects of two types of paraphrase practices (teacher-led and Web-based) on Korean university and graduate students' paraphrase awareness, performance, and types. The teacher-led and Web-based group both had four-week intensive practices on paraphrasing including instruction on plagiarism, citation, and paraphrasing strategies with teacher modeling of paraphrasing. Teacher-led practices placed a focus on explicit instruction of grammar and vocabulary, whereas Web-based practices triggered learner-directed practices. The Web-based group was informed of Internet sites and trained to use them for paraphrasing. The results of the study show positive effects of both practice types on paraphrase awareness and performance, but not on paraphrase types. More beneficial effects of teacher-led practices were noted over that of Web-based practices, though the latter were more positively evaluated by the participants. The findings suggest the positive effects of short-term explicit instruction on paraphrasing to prevent plagiarism; however, they also imply positive impact of Web-based practices for long-term learning.

I. INTRODUCTION

With an increasing number of English-mediated courses in L2 context (ESL and EFL contexts), academic writing in English has become a day-to-day task. Academic writing from sources has been a central issue in L2 writing research and instruction over the past era (Carson, 2001; Choi, 2009; Johns, 1993; Keck, 2006). Before they write on a given topic using sources, L2 student writers are expected to read and think critically about the
